Date of erection: Late eighteenth century

Builder: General John Hancock

Present condition: Fair

Description:

Fotheringay is a T-shaped brick building, the main front of which is curiously asymmetric. The doorway with its double-deck porch is at the right of the facade, with two windows at the left. It would seem the builder planned to extend the building at a later time. The interior is said to contain good woodwork.

In the yard stands a small early house in great dilapidation.
